Cardiac lymphocytes derived from the pericardial fluid of patients with inflammatory heart disease were studied. The lymphocytes obtained from the pericardial fluid of patients with anthracycline-induced cardiomyopathy and of patients with ischaemic heart disease, who died 5-6 years after the primary coronary surgery, were morphologically characterized and studied for the capabilities of DNA and protein synthesis. The lymphocytes obtained from the pericardial fluid of patients with acute, subacute and chronic ischaemic heart disease, in whom death had occurred within 24 h of admission, 10-20 days and 5-6 years after the primary coronary surgery, were studied for the capabilities of lymphocyte cytolytic activity. The lymphocytes from the pericardial fluid of patients with inflammatory heart disease possessed a "greater" frequency of lymphocyte aggregates, which may be precursors of the circulating and, therefore, the inflammatory cells derived from the pericardial fluid. The lymphocytes obtained from the pericardial fluid of patients with a period of prelymphopenia, when they are toxic to the recipient cells, displayed a "greater" frequency of lymphocyte aggregates and "small" lymphocytes. The lymphocytes obtained from the pericardial fluid of patients with acute, subacute and chronic ischaemic heart disease had a "small" and "greater" frequency of lymphocyte aggregates and "small" and "greater" frequency of "large" lymphocytes when the recipients were normal lymphocytes or lymphocytes from anthracycline-treated rats. The lymphocytes isolated from the pericardial fluid of patients with acute, subacute and chronic ischaemic heart disease, when tested in cytotoxic reactions for the susceptibility to a cytotoxic effector cells of normal lymphocytes, exhibited a "small" and "greater" frequency of lymphocyte aggregates and "small" lymphocytes.
