Kali Linux Repacks for GOG download : Ubuntu.Current systems for monitoring aircraft operations employ the use of digital airspeed indicators ("ADSIs"). However, ADSIs do not account for aircraft altitude. To avoid running off of the runway or colliding with an obstruction (e.g., telephone wires, buildings, etc.), aircraft operators need to know their aircraft's altitude. Today, flight managers rely on archaic flight procedures which do not take into account the current and accurate altitude. These flight procedures are typically not revised every year or more, in some cases decades, unless a major accident or incident has occurred. To avoid running off the runway or colliding with an obstruction (e.g., telephone wires, buildings, etc.), aircraft operators need to know their aircraft's altitude. Current systems for measuring aircraft altitude include using GPS data, barometric pressure, or an inertial reference. The drawbacks of GPS include the need for antennae and computer chips. Barometric pressure measurements can be inaccurate because the barometric pressure reading is affected by temperature and altitude. Inertial reference measurements are subject to drift and noise. As a result, these systems do not provide accurate and consistent aircraft altitude measurements, which may result in aircraft operators running off of the runway or colliding with an obstruction (e.g., telephone wires, buildings, etc.). One such system for measuring aircraft altitude is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,796,461 ("the '461 patent"), issued on Aug. 18, 1998, the entire contents of which are incorporated by reference herein. The '461 patent discloses a data acquisition system, an inertial reference and a method for measuring aircraft altitude. To measure aircraft altitude using the system disclosed in the '461 patent, a system operator periodically switches from the inertial reference to the air pressure sensor. The system operator then measures the rate of change in the aircraft altitude based upon the rate of change of the aircraft velocity using the inertial reference. The system operator then calculates the aircraft altitude using the measured rate of change of the aircraft altitude. However, the system operator in the '461 patent manually switches between the inertial reference
