Psychological science research is becoming increasingly important to health care. However, many health care providers are not aware of or knowledgeable about the state of the science and results of these studies. There is a need to translate knowledge about psychological processes into nursing interventions and improve the care of people with mental disorders. The current review describes how nurses can use psychological science research and apply it in practice to improve patient care. Numerous factors influence the success of the translation of psychological science research to nursing practice. Most of the nursing literature on this topic is descriptive in nature.
